Our illustrious mayor can still play the game

By Barry Poe

For one week per year, Steve "Reno" Dickman, better known as the mayor of our fair town, turns back the clock and heads south to sunny Florida for the Minnesota Twins Fantasy Camp.

That is Kent Hrbek in the background coaching third base. He and Tom Brunansky were my coaches for the week." Photo on right: Taking a break. Photos courtesy of Reno.

Why, you ask, would somebody in his 60s still lace up the cleats, run the bases and try to hit baseballs?

"Because my brother owns the camp, so that works out pretty good," Reno said. "So I go down there and help him out and I also get to play."

Brunsville native Stan Dickman, Steve's younger brother, took over operations of the Twins camp seven years ago. That gave Reno an excuse every January to leave the volatile climate in the Midwest for Ft. Myers, the spring home of the Minnesota Twins.

This year there were 28 former major league players in attendance, including notable ex-Twins stars Frank Qulici, Tony Oliva, Greg Gagne, Bert Blyleven, Kent Hrbek, Tom Brunansky, Tim Laudner and Gene Larkin, to mention a few.

Hall of Famer Rod Carew made his first appearance this year and, according to Reno, wants to return next year.

Two of the ex-players act as managers for each of the 10 14-player teams. The teams play seven-inning games all week. On the first Sunday, the pros "scout" each of the players for a draft Sunday evening before the games commence.

Campers are supposed to be 30 and over, although Stan does allow some younger guys to take part along with their fathers, with the stipulation they can't pitch. The "youngsters" can only pitch three innings per week and the teams played nine seven-inning games during a six-day period.

South Dakota National Guardsman, Patrick Jones, son of Tom and Michelle Jones, is home from Afghanistan.

Jones, who shipped out to Afghanistan on January 31, 2013 after training in Texas, was stationed in Bagram where he was supervisor for the military police that guarded prisoners.

Despite the horrible weather, the soldiers reunited with their families in Rapid City on December 23. All were home by Christmas Eve.

Jones attended school to be a staff sergeant and earned his bachelor's degree in history.

While overseas, Jones created a designated-driver service company called Trust Me, I'm Sober. The company sends out two people and one vehicle so that the customer and the customer's vehicle get home safely. I'm Sober's opening night was New Year's Eve.

Jones is at home in Sioux Falls with his wife, Angela; his son, Marshal, who will be five in June; and his daughter, Charlie, who turned a year old on Dec. 16.

"It's fun but fairly competitive, as competitive as it can be for guys in their 50s and 60s," said Reno. "The oldest guy there this year was 81 and he pitched. He was there with his three sons and two grandsons and a son-in-law. He even threw a seven-inning shutout."

Reno says since a lot of the same people attend every year, it becomes kind of a family atmosphere. If you are there 10 years, you're inducted into the Fantasy Camp Hall of Fame.

Reno, in case you're interested, still has three years to go before gaining that honor.

Evening banquets are held at least four times a week, complete with awards and a "kangaroo court" in which Blyleven is in charge. All proceeds, but the way, go to the local Children's Hospital. On an average, the camp raises at least $5,000 per year for the hospital.

Carew graciously signed memorabilia, including a jersey that Stan Dickman originally planned to auction off. But after Carew discovered that camper Mark Haigh, an attorney from Sioux Falls, is battling the same form of cancer that claimed the life of his 18-year-old daughter Michelle Carew in 1996, he presented the jersey to Haigh at the Friday banquet.

Men from all walks of life take part in the camps, some who save every penny to come up with the hefty fee and others who don't have any problem plunking down the big bucks. They're all there for one common bond, to play baseball and feel young again for at least one week.

Reno, who has spent a good portion of his life playing either baseball or softball, plans to keep attending as long as he feels good.

Nice to hear from an old baseball player.

"Old is right," laughs Reno.
